What Is a Salary Continuation Plan?

A salary continuation plan describes in writing, before any disability occurs, what an employer will do in the event an employee becomes disabled. With such a plan, the employer can continue paying all or part of an employee's salary.

For a salary continuation plan to be valid, the plan must be executed and made known to covered employees before any disability occurs. Having the plan in writing protects all parties and is strongly recommended.

A salary continuation plan creates a win-win situation.

- The employer builds loyalty and retains key employees
- The employee feels a sense of caring and appreciation
- The producer sets the stage for a possible multi-life or Guaranteed Standard Issue disability insurance sale

Employers usually divide employees into classes, so benefits may vary from class to class. Benefits must be consistent within each class. The plan should specify for each employee class the percentage of salary that will be continued following a disability and for how long.

Types of plans

It is not uncommon for corporate business owners to continue to receive 100% of their salary for three to six months, followed by 75% of their salary for three months, and 60% of their salary thereafter, until age 65. The funding for such arrangements would be partially from business earnings and partially from a disability income insurance policy offered by The Standard.

For other employee groups, benefits may occur only for a few days or weeks of sick pay. A disability income insurance policy from The Standard would begin to pay the benefits for a disabled employee after an elimination period.

In both cases, the disability insurance benefit is paid for by the employer with premiums deductible to the business. The cost of this coverage is not considered income to the insured, although the benefits are taxable to the employee.

Salary continuation plans may be set up to benefit all employees, including owners in a C corporation.

Who Is Not Eligible

Owners of sole proprietorships, partnerships, S corporations and limited liability companies who are not considered employees are ineligible for benefits under a salary continuation plan.

Consequences of Not Having a Written Salary Continuation Plan

One of the consequences of not having a written salary continuation plan before a disability is that payments made to a business owner/employee may be construed as corporate dividends, non-deductible to the business and taxable to the recipient as ordinary income.

Without a written plan in place, payments made to an employee may be considered ad hoc, non-deductible gift distributions, taxable to the employee. Ad hoc payments are those made by employers to sick or injured employees on a discretionary basis and not according to a pre-existing plan.

After a disability begins, it is too late to establish a salary continuation plan.

When a Salary Continuation Plan Is Established

When a salary continuation plan is established, it is automatically considered to be funded by the employer, whether or not there is a source of funding.

If disability insurance is not used for at least a portion of the funding, the entire burden of salary continuation payments under the plan falls to the business.

Should an unfunded plan be subjected to a valid claim, the requirements of Statement 112 of the Financial Accounting Standards Board (FAS) may impact the financial standing of the business and impede or prevent the business from obtaining loans.

FAS 112

FAS 112 requires employers who provide self-funded benefits, including salary continuation benefits payable to disabled employees, to recognize and account for those benefits. The requirements of FAS 112 strongly compel an employer to purchase disability income insurance to fund a salary continuation plan.

Under FAS 112, businesses that are obligated to pay an uninsured disability benefit to an employee must account for the liability of disability benefits to be paid in the future. This accounting does not address the possibility of recovery or premature death. An uninsured disability benefit obligation then becomes a current liability and an expense equal to the present value of future benefits. This uninsured disability benefit obligation must be accounted for on the business's financial statement.

A long line of federal court rulings support the IRS position on ad hoc payments. The underlying message of these rulings is clear:

If a business owner intends to deduct payments made to a disabled employee, a salary continuation plan must be in place before payments begin.

For example: A 40 year-old disabled employee who receives a $5,000 monthly benefit is expected to live to age 65, when a retirement plan might take over. At an interest rate of 5%, the employer would be required to account for a reserve of more than $850,000. Most business owners are probably unaware of this potential liability. In addition, the business would have to pay the benefit to the employee and suffer the resulting negative impact to cash flow.

Does FAS 112 Impact Taxes?

Companies with no qualified sick pay plan do not receive a tax deduction for disability compensation paid to employees. For shareholder employees, such compensation may be considered a dividend. Compensation paid to non-shareholder employees is considered ad hoc or gift payments and is not deductible.

If FAS 112 applies to an unfunded plan, the business's auditor would be unable to give an unqualified opinion on the business's financial statements used for credit and other transactions. This may be true even where there is an established qualified sick pay plan, unless the employer is using disability income insurance to fund a portion of the plan.

Not only does insurance satisfy the financial reserve requirements of FAS 112, it provides a set benefit in a cost-effective manner. FAS 112 is another reason why employers should strongly consider insured qualified sick pay plans.

Internal Revenue Code Section 105 allows the establishment of qualified sick pay plans. Section 162 permits deductibility of funds spent on the sick pay plan and Section 106 states that if the plan is funded with insurance the premiums are not considered part of the taxable income of covered employees.

Tax Court Rulings

Chism Ice Cream Company v. Commission of Internal Revenue¹

This is one of many federal tax court rulings that show ad hoc payments are not tax deductible.

E.W. Chism founded Chism Ice Cream Company in 1905 and was the driving force behind the business throughout his life. Mr. Chism became the primary shareholder of the company when it was incorporated in 1933, and served as president of the company until his death in 1956.

Mr. Chism was seriously incapacitated in 1952 and was no longer able to run the day-to-day operations of the company. Despite his incapacity, the company continued to pay Mr. Chism either the same or increased amounts of salary. Because Chism Ice Cream Company had an informal policy of paying employees while they recovered from illnesses and injuries, the company's management assumed there was a sick pay plan in place. The company continued to deduct the payments to Mr. Chism as a legitimate business expense, and these payments were treated by the company as salary on its books and in its corporate income tax returns.

The IRS did not agree. Instead, the Service denied the deductions claimed by the company for post-employment salary paid to Mr. Chism. The company appealed to the Tax Court, which held in favor of the IRS. The Tax Court ruled that no sick pay plan had ever been put in place, no employees had been notified or advised of the existence of any such plan, nor did they have the right to demand benefits under such a plan. In other words, a portion of the salary paid to Mr. Chism represented excessive compensation for services rendered, which is not deductible by the company.

The end result? Instead of deductible salary, the company had paid Mr. Chism non-deductible excessive compensation and dividends from 1952 to 1956. As a result of these non-deductible payments, the IRS collected a combined total of $45,000 in back taxes, penalties and interest.

Substantial additional corporate and personal tax had to be paid in the Chism case because:

- (1) no salary continuation plan was set up in advance;
- (2) the details of who received what, beginning when, and for how long were not communicated to the employees;
- (3) the details of the plan were not put in writing (while the regulations did not require that a plan be in writing, a written plan was essential to establishing that a plan existed prior to any disability).

Other Rulings

In *Larkin v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*², the Tax Court held that payments were not deductible to the employer as payments under a sick pay plan. The court found that no plan had been communicated to employees and the ad hoc payments made by the company benefited shareholders rather than employees.

In *Occhipinti v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*³, the Tax Court denied any tax deduction for payments to an employee under a company accident or health plan. The court found that there was complete absence of evidence of a plan, formal or informal, maintained by the company for paying its employees during an illness.

_____ was Chairperson of the meeting and _____ acted as Secretary.

The meeting was called to order by the Chairperson and minutes were recorded by the Secretary. A waiver of notice of the meeting, duly executed and dated _____, 20____ was presented. A quorum of Directors was present.

The Chairperson stated that the purpose of the meeting was to authorize and direct that the necessary steps be taken to place in operation a Salary Continuation Plan for certain valuable employees. Discussion followed, and thereafter, upon motion duly made and seconded, the following resolution was adopted by unanimous vote.

RESOLVED, that the Corporation establish a Salary Continuation Plan to pay the following benefits to the following eligible employees:

Group I Employees: [list employee names]

The Corporation will pay all employees in Group I full (100%) salary for the initial _____ weeks/months of total disability and three-fourths (75%) salary for the next _____ weeks/months of continuing total disability and one-half (50%) salary for the next _____ weeks/months of continuing total disability.

Group II Employees: [list employee names]

The Corporation will pay all employees in Group II full (100%) salary for the initial _____ weeks/months of total disability and one-half (50%) salary for the next _____ weeks/months of continuing total disability.

Group III Employees: [list employee names]

The Corporation will pay all employees in Group III full (100%) salary for the initial _____ weeks/months of total disability and _____% salary for the next _____ weeks/months of continuing total disability.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Corporation shall satisfy these obligations by purchasing appropriate disability income insurance policies from Standard Insurance Company [or The Standard Life Insurance Company of New York, if in New York], on the lives of all eligible employees who are insurable at rates not exceeding _____% of standard premiums. If an eligible employee is not insurable, the Corporation shall create a sinking fund for future use by periodically contributing an amount equal to _____% of standard premiums on that employee. Corporate officers are authorized and instructed to pay the premium on all policies as they become due.

Also, any insured employee shall be notified that he or she has the option of having all, or part, of the cost of any such policies on his or her life treated as additional compensation. Should this option not be selected by the employee, it shall be made clear that all premium payments will be made as part of this plan and not treated as additional compensation. Benefits paid to the employee in this case will be taxable.

For purposes of this plan, the definition of total disability shall be as defined in the above policies.

The funds necessary to pay benefits under this plan shall come from disability income insurance contracts and the general assets of the Corporation, as necessary. Each insured employee shall be the Owner and Loss Payee of all insurance contracts purchased under this plan.
